This article examines the factors associated with maternal attachment in mother-infant dyads at risk for eating disorders. Attachment was studied in children at risk for eating disorders, in comparison with a sample of children at risk but without an eating problem, and a control group of never-eating-disordered children. After controlling for other maternal attachment and child behavior problems, attachment security in the risk group was significantly less than attachment security in the control group. Analyses failed to reveal significant differences between the two risk groups. The findings are discussed from the perspective of attachment development.[Changes in the biliary tract after transplantation of an orthotopic liver lobe]. The authors examined 69 liver-transplanted patients, in
